In this courier The Minister asks them to continue to maintain operations in the energy, transport and cleaning sectors to maintain life in the homes of French citizens and thanks them for their commitment and sense of responsibility: "I want to Address to women and men who continue to work in the field, in the sectors that fall under the Ministry of Ecological and Inclusive Transition: energy, transport, water and waste.

I want to tell you, while we are engaged in a total health war, you allow the country to stand.

I want to tell you that I measure and that each French person fully measures your sense of responsibility and your professionalism. "

You operate our power plants and networks to power hospitals, businesses and every home.

You run our trains and public transport, you take care of the state of the roads and the supply of fuel to allow the carers, the sick and those who have to go to work, to move.

You transport our goods so that we continue to feed ourselves and so that our businesses function.

You ensure the availability of quality water.

You collect and process our waste every day.

I am also thinking of public works workers, essential to guarantee the sustainability of all these sectors that keep the country standing. To all, I want to tell you that, since the beginning of the crisis, every day, I have been in contact with your employers and their federations to allow you to work in the best conditions of health safety. My first and constant concern is that the organization of your work allows you to respect the barrier gestures and the distances that protect you. In each of your professions, in each of your sectors, the Government is fully mobilized so that you can calmly fulfill your crucial tasks. The health crisis we are going through highlights more than ever your fundamental role in the life of the Nation. For this, I thank you very sincerely and assure you of my total commitment at your side." Elisabeth Borne Minister of the Ecological and Inclusive Transition
